Nansen's Curious Discovery.
The return of Nansen from the Arctic and his great achievements are still the wonder of the scientific world. Nansen's theory of the movement of the ice pack and the experience of the Fram have been a revelation to the Arctic experts. When the expedition started out it was considered a foolhardy venture, but it now seems Nansen was right. Among the many things found to confirm his theory of the movement toward the pole was a wooden box, which was picked up near the farthest point reached. This box was opened and to the delight of the entire expedition was found to contain two dozen bottles of Rainier Beer. It was found to be cool, sparkling and refreshing. It is likely Nansen's testimonial to the superior qualities and taste of Rainier Beer may be added to the many already given by prominent men of the Northwest. On tap or in bottles at the Criterion.
